uainted with the facts it may be well to state that this General Assembly represents that member of the great family of Presbyterian churches usually called "New School." Assembly itself is composed of about two hundred members, of whom it is designed that one half shall be laymen. If the representation is full there must be precisely as many laymen as isters. The body is strictly a representative body. It represents about sixteen hundred inisters, fifteen hundred churches and nearly one hundred and forty thousand communicants These communicants are among the most loyal people of the country. He prepared a strong paper denying the propriety of acceding to the request. This paper was passed by his Presbytery and sent to Virginia. The response from the whole North was in the same strain. The subject continued to be discussed, and successive Assemblies took action continually condemning the peculiar institution in terms of increasing strength till 1857, when all the Southern churches withdrew from the body, in order to get away from Anti-Slavery agitation. For Jesus, our Saviour, the promise hath giver And told us "of such is the kingdom of heaven. From the Memphis Bulletin. Perished in the Spring Time. When autumn, with chilly breath, withers the beauty of the sad-colored flowers of the latter summer, the sight, though depressing, has an appropriateness that prevents its shocking our feelings. Not such is the influence we feel when some sudden storm has dashed to earth with fatal violence, the tender bud that was just opening its loveliness to the genial skies of May. disposes us to resignation, and softens the poignancy of our grief. Very different is it when youth, with all its fascinations, is premawhen youth, with all its fascinations, is prema-turely snatched from us, and the untimely grave yawns for those to whom the fut grave yawns for those to whom the future promised priceless gifts and many happy years. "Whom the gods love die young," is a truth holy writ might have recorded—for they leave life while its banquet is yet fresh and joyous—while no dregs have mingled bitterness with the wine; but not the less startling is it to those they leave, that so much promise should bear no fruit in this world, where their presence was a blessing, and their unpremeditated virtues added a charm which is one of the dearest treasures of humanity. "Whom the gods love die young," but bitter is the bereavement of those whom divinity has not so favored. These remarks are wrung from us by the loss of the daughter of Gen. BUCKLAND, commander of this post. Three weeks ago she arrived here with her mother from Ohio. With all the attractions of her sixteen summare about her; an amiability that won every heart; a fascinaite, and her company was sought and valued wherever she became known. Fresh as the spring whose charms at this moment deck ev-ery hill and meadow, she enjoyed her advent to new scenes; welcomed with youthful zest the appreciative regard of the new circle amid the appreciative regard of the new circle amid which she was introduced; and rejoiced once more to join her honored and happy sire, himself proud of the sweet blossom Providence had vouchsafed as the treasure of his life—when death placked the flower in the very youth of its loveliness, and stamped its fleeting charm with the impress of immortality.

Suddenly seized by a congestive chill, two days of suffering were passed, and the glow of youth was exchanged for the patier of death; the huoyancy of budding life for the dark recesses of the grave! Such is the side of the shield presented to weeping friends, bereaved of the pet lamb they had clasped to bosoms that thrilled with undying affection; this view is the appearance—there is no darkness, no tears, no aching void in the true reality. Ange saw a lovely flower, striving to attain the full beauty of its nature, growing in a soil inadequate to supply the rich nourishment required to bring out its exuberant and glorious perfec-tions—they plucked it from the poor and meagre earth, and transplanted it into the soil of paradise beside the streams of living waters.
